NATO's push into the Caucasus: geopolitical flashpoints and limits for expansion

By: Antonopoulos, P (Antonopoulos, Paul) [1]; Velez, R (Velez, Renato) [2]; Cottle, D (Cottle, Drew) [3]

DEFENCE AND SECURITY ANALYSIS
Volume: 33
Issue: 4
Pages: 366-379
DOI: 10.1080/14751798.2017.1379119
Published: 2017
Document Type: Article

Abstract

The Caucasus has been a major flashpoint of contention between NATO and a resurgent Russia since the collapse of the Soviet Union. The rivalry saw the escalation of hostility in the region during the brief 2008 Russo-Georgian War where a NATO-backed Georgia challenged South Ossetia supported by the Russian military. In 2011, NATO officially recognised Georgia as a potential member, challenging Russia's traditional sphere of influence in the Caucasus. Moscow says the Eastward expansion of NATO into the Baltics and to include Georgia as a member state is a method of containing a resurgent Russia. However, the former Soviet Republics of Ukraine, the Baltics and Georgia, maintain that Russia represents a threat to their sovereignty, as seen by the Russian support of the breakaway unrecognised Republics of South Ossetia and Abkhazia. A hostile rivalry between the Russian-backed Armenia and Azerbaijan, which is reliant upon NATO-member Turkey, intensifies the polarisation in the Caucasus.

Keywords

Author Keywords: NATO; Russia; Caucasus; Georgia; Azerbaijan

Author Information

Reprint Address: Antonopoulos, P (reprint author)

Ctr Syncret Studies, Belgrade, Serbia.

Addresses:

[ 1 ] Ctr Syncret Studies, Belgrade, Serbia
[ 2 ] Univ Chile, Inst Int Studies, Santiago, Chile
[ 3 ] Western Sydney Univ, Dept Int Relat, Milperra, NSW, Australia

E-mail Addresses: paul.antonopoulos@hotmail.com